Activity-based teaching with a hands-on approach

Children with disabilities often face challenges in social situations. Teaching them soft skills can help them better navigate social interactions, build relationships, and feel more integrated into their communities. Soft skills training can help improve their ability to express themselves effectively, making it easier for them to convey their needs and thoughts. These skills can enable children to find creative solutions to challenges they may encounter in daily life.

As children with disabilities transition to adulthood, these skills can significantly increase their chances of finding and retaining employment. Teaching soft skills to children with disabilities can help reduce stigma and misconceptions about their capabilities. When these individuals demonstrate strong interpersonal and problem-solving skills, it challenges stereotypes and promotes inclusivity.
